February 3, 2014 — Ted Alexander, Republican candidate for United States Senate in North Carolina, has signed The Repeal Pledge to undo ObamaCare.

"Mr. Alexander's decision to take The Repeal Pledge shows voters that, when it comes to health care, he gets it — he understands that ObamaCare is a government infringement on our constitutional liberties, and he knows that it will lead to more government and less freedom, will place government bureaucrats between doctors and their patients, and will limit patients' choice and control," said Heather Higgins, President & CEO of Independent Women's Voice.

"One needs only to look at the millions of people who are seeing their health insurance cancelled because of ObamaCare, when the President promised that if they liked their plan they could keep it, to see how ObamaCare is hurting Americans," Higgins added. "And it will only get worse."

The Repeal Pledge advocates not just repeal, but defunding, deauthorizing, and dismantling the misleadingly-titled Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act, passed in early 2010. The Repeal Pledge was designed as a litmus test to help the American public understand which candidates and office holders are serious about repeal, versus those who claim to be but won't actually take action.

"Mr. Alexander's signature on the Pledge indicates that if elected, he would do everything in his power to keep ObamaCare from adversely affecting the citizens of North Carolina," added Hadley Heath, health care policy analyst at Independent Women's Voice.

Signers of the Repeal Pledge believe that this law cannot be "fixed" and that stopping its implementation and ultimately repealing it are necessary first steps to ensure that citizens and their doctors, not government bureaucrats, have choice and control over their health care, and that medical care in our country becomes more affordable and available.
